Subject: Money for schools

I feel that allowing Microsoft to get a larger foothold in the education market is a monopolistic action in and of it's self, not a punishment. This will just be another way for Microsoft to force their will on people, and more importantly on young impressionable children. I feel that to punish monopolists, they should pay with reduce power or a fine or both, but not with control of a new market in which they currently only have a small foothold.

Sincerely,

John R. Miller
